submitted 3 days ago by dysgraphical Rapidshare 4 3 - announcement

Yikes.

This is especially awkward considering the top post on the our frontpage right now is a TorrentFreak article citing my best efforts to curb away copyright infringement on this community. Lets get down to what's going on.

Who?

On March 14th (9:26 PM UTC) we received a modmail from a Reddit Admin with the following message.

Dear Moderators,

TL;DR: This is an official warning from Reddit that we are receiving too many copyright infringement notices about material posted to your community. We will be required to ban this community if you can't adequately address the problem.

First, some background.

1. Redditors aren't allowed to submit material that infringes someone else's copyrights.
2. We (the Reddit admins) are required by law to process notices from people who say that material on Reddit violates their copyrights. The process is described in the DMCA section of the Reddit User Agreement.
3. The law also requires us to issue bans in cases of repeat infringement. Sometimes a repeat infringement problem is limited to just one user and we ban just that person. Other times the problem pervades a whole community and we ban the community.

This is our formal warning about repeat infringement in this community. Over the past months we've had to remove material from the community in response to copyright notices 74 times. That's an unusually high number taking into account the community's size.

Every community is different, but here are some general suggestions.

1. Consider whether your community's rules encourage or tolerate infringing content, and revise if necessary to be more clear.

2. Actively enforce your community's rules. If you need help, recruit more moderators to help.
3. Remove any existing infringing content from your community so Reddit doesn't get new notices about past content. If you can't adequately address the problem, we'll have to ban the community.

Sincerely, Reddit Legal

What?

This was my initial response to the modmail. Reddit Legal states that they have acted 74 times on these copyright notices through removals, but it is the first time we have been officially contacted regarding any infringement where it be through modmail or PMs. Considering our stringent rules against distributing pirated content through this platform, it is unclear what constitutes copyright infringement to Reddit or whether the simple mention of a release name falls under their broad interpretation. Another issue with this is that as moderators, we do not have the ability to see when a user or Admin deletes content. While "admins*" show up as a moderator in our moderation logs, there are 0 actions listed. This means that Admins can remove content at their own discretion and leave behind no notice or log for moderators. We cannot take any precautionary or preventative measures if we do not know what was removed.

Where?

As of now, we are unaware where all these infringements took place. Were they regular posts? Crossposts? Comments? PMs? We reached out via email inquiring on the most recent DMCA notices and Reddit's Legal Support replied:

Hello,
The most recent DMCA notices we processed (which led to the removal of content from your community) came from Warner Bros. Entertainment Inc.
Regards,
Reddit Legal Support

We replied immediately requesting a list of offending material that was removed and have not received a reply yet.

When? Why?

Reddit Legal states that these repeated infringements occurred "over the past months" but the timeline isn't concrete in helping us analyze when it occurred and through what means. It is also convenient that Reddit has permitted this number of DMCA notices to accumulate without reaching out to us at all. Had Reddit warned us earlier, we would have had ample time to revisit our current rules or make adjustments on what sort of content is permitted.

What now?

It has become abundantly clear in the past months and years that Reddit has never been the bastion of freedom that many people see it as. The many subreddit purges that have occurred in the past few days further confirm it. Reddit's passivity in enforcing its own rules is continuously tested whenever one of its subreddits are thrust into the limelight by the media. As we wait for more information from Reddit Legal, there is one certainty that comes from all of this,

r/Piracy will be banned.

It is a matter of when. While we continue moderating the community to the best of our ability, should Reddit continue expanding its definition of copyright infringement and blindly react to every false copyright notice, this community's days are counted - not just us, but the many other related communities that openly permit the discussion of digital piracy or encourage it.

We will continue communicating with Reddit Legal in hopes that we can identify what content broken infringement but it would be naive to expect this will be the last time we hear from them.

If you have any questions, feel free to ask.

Update

As of March 18th, 9:54 PDT, Reddit Legal Support has responded to our email inquiry providing a spreadsheet of this year's removals (38) including URLs, copyright owners, and the exact date and time (unspecified whether it is when the DMCA notices were filed or the posts/comments removed).

The following content was removed; sorted by copyright holder:

Type	quantity	Copyright owner	description
comment	23	Warner Bros. Entertainment Inc	streaming site URL
comment	2	Warner Bros. Entertainment Inc	music streaming site URL comment	1	Warner Bros. Entertainment Inc	Asking if a streaming site was down post	4	Warner Bros. Entertainment Inc & IFC Films	Release post - no links post	1	Warner Bros. Entertainment Inc	Asking if a streaming site was down post	1	Warner Bros. Entertainment Inc	Troubleshooting a streaming site
post	4	JetBrains s.r.o	Inquiring on JetBrains licensing

Type	quantity	Copyright owner	description
comment	1	JetBrains s.r.o	Inquiring on JetBrains licensing
post	1	Spectrasonics Ltd.	Guide on installing Spectrasonics - no links

What does this mean?

- Reddit does not bother to sort through their DMCA notices and complies immediately whether the content is infringing or not.
- Release titles are considering copyright infringement.
- Sharing a streaming site URL is considered copyright infringement.
- Asking if a streaming site is down is considered copyright infringement.
- Sharing guides on installing programs and not providing links is considered copyright infringement.

Biggest takeaway

20 of Warner Bros. takedowns on the streaming site URL were comments in a thread posted in Oct 11, 2016. That's right. Copyright holders can scour 2+ year-old threads and file infringement on every single comment. This is especially significant because it means that there is no way for us to combat these frivolous infringements. Any copyright holder that wishes to file a notice can dig deep enough and find anything that's slipped in between the cracks and Reddit will gladly comply. This is not pertinent to r/Piracy^[1], but rather any community.

What now?

Nothing really. We're in the same spot as yesterday.

This is business as usual for Reddit. It's blatant censorship. It's bad for ad revenue.

So more like we got 74 complaints from advertisers that they don't want their ads served in r/piracy.

Skeet skeet skeet. We can't monetize your subreddit. Here are some lies about why we'll say we banned your community.

The quality on Reddit is dropping sharply day by day.

What's sickening is that neither the Admins nor the Legal Team seem to be willing to provide the mods with the list of infringing "posts" that they have. I'm willing to bet the Legal team has verified exactly 0 of these posts for any trace of actual infringement. It's likely that reddit has received some form of angry letter(s) demanding that /r/Piracy specifically must be banned "or else."

I'll also guess that they haven't got a clue how to handle it when some company makes an effort to legally troll with as many DMCA's as they can cram into the inbox at one time.

I'd imagine that 98% of the offending "posts" don't actually infringe; they just discuss something in detail. (Like a release post does, where users get together and discuss a recent crack or repack.)

Warner Brothers is a known copyright troll with a large track record of using bots that flood DMCA inboxes with false complaints just because something matches a set number of keywords.

I can seed their content and basically show them the finger with both my hands while showing my buttocks and they just can't do anything to stop me because they can't buy our politicians.

Still sucks that I might lose a very awesome community I started to love and enjoy soon enough because of these greedy fuckers :(

torrenting is a big No No here without a proxy or vpn. when i was younger i didnt really know what i was Doing and started torrenting a film. after Like 0,2% i stopped it because I Had a Bad feeling.

2 Weeks later we got a adhortatory (legal warning?) letter and my fathers lawyer had to send Them a declaration to cease and desist.

cost him a couple of hundred euros and he wasnt happy to say the least.

I am Not Sure If i got all the Details (and technical terms) right since it happened some years ago and id rather not bring it up again ;)
so generally you either need to trust your encryption and anonymous proxys when torrenting or get a VPN.

and then there was a case where people got letters for streaming on redtube. I think it was thrown Out in court, but the hassle isnt
Something you need. there are more examples

There are people who don't like to use ad-blockers. I don't understand why. Just whitelist the sites you prefer not to block on.

I knew one guy who described adblockers as "worse than Hitler." Clearly a joke but he wholeheartedly disagreed with the use of them.

Plus, it's a more difficult to block ads on mobile, though not impossible.

Longtime lurker here; I created an account to say this: The mods deserve nothing except our eternal gratitude for this sub. It is one of the few places on Reddit that actually has real value. /r/Piracy is indeed the only sub that I've actually learned something from. And, as time goes on, we see the divide between those who have power and those who do not, and I'm glad we see this divide. Piracy is a digital method of resistance, something that enables genuine creative effort, devoid of corporate ideology. It is given to us and expressed by us. It is our defiance to the filth of copyright, DRM, monopoly and the whole corporate apparatus. They hate us because we threaten to eclipse them completely. Because we threaten to render them obsolete.

Farewell.

Reddit Legal states that they have acted 74 times on these copyright notices through removals, but it is the first time we have been officially contacted regarding any infringement where it be through modmail or PMs.

Its obvious that when Reddit wants something gone they will go to any length necessary to make it so. Not talking to the mods of the community makes it so painfully obvious. Fuck reddit.

It's a social media site that has the Reddit look, but the privacy is WAY better, and this is what they say about takedowns.

The administrators of this site will not cooperate with any court, government or law enforcement agency, or provide any private data from our Site to anyone. We are not Americans and are not subject to American law. We will not appoint any American administrators because of the oppressive data retention and data seizure laws that country places on its citizens. We will not store raddle.me on a server located inside the USA.

We will delete the entire site and its content before allowing your data to fall into the hands of any third party.

You can delete all of your own posts and comments if you like at any time, individually or all at once following this wiki.

Admins will retire your empty account if you like, which just amounts to making the username available to others. As things stand, there is no way to delete private messages.

That's pretty ballsy. I like this kind of thing, but the true test for any platform like that is when someone puts up child pornography or terrorism stuff and the like, pretty fucked but what happens when admins can't physically comply with that?

If they're interested in good faith. My experience with other banned subs, the vagueness of the charges, as well as /u/dysgraphical's sincere puzzlement over the removals Reddit admin claim in their communication above tells me they're not.

My guess is that they're making it up and looking to remove the sub because content like this is keeping them from being the next Facebook. It's my guess as I said, but they started this back in March of last year and the admin playbook today appears to be the same as it ever was.

r/CrackWatch Admin here

We also received 2 or 3 of copyright complaints from our regular posters. Our regular posters only post NFO's from database websites like predb, which do not contain illegal content, like torrent or download links. We are very strict on sharing illegal links and we issue warnings and delete those links, sometimes bans have to be issued if the user ignores our warnings.

We have never received complaints from reddit admins about this, rather the posters themselves came to us and said that they got a notification about their post being removed by a copyright strike. It might be because of our strictness towards links, but I would hate to see this subreddit fall. This subreddit is the core of all other piracy subreddits. If this subreddit gets banned, we will most likely go next. You have our full support from the CrackWatch team.

We have a rule on our subreddit: Domain links are allowed, direct links arent.

A question I have seen being raised several times recently is about <https://raddle.me/f/Piracy>

It is linked on the sidebar, yet at least one mod said it's not really something worth considering.

Can we get some statement on that? Would be nice to have an official alternative for this particular sub, so that people would go there. It's pretty clear that if we rely on the userbase to search for alternatives, many, if not most, will be lost.

Raddle has been recommended by a mod who is inactive in moderating r/Piracy. If they wish to take up the task of formulating a migration, then that's great for them. For what it's worth, I don't sponsor any another alternative - the people will have to decide where they go and how they moderate their community.

Mods should set up a poll with various options, something like a Google form. We can then decide on what alternative to move to. The important thing is the community, so it is essential that everyone arrives at a consensus and simultaneously moves at once. Otherwise a fragmented community will benefit no one.

And that "part" being half the site. Aside from pirating subs, unconventional humor like r/ImGoingToHellForThis is getting purged rapidly. Most of the smaller ones already got wiped out in the ban wave 5 months ago. People with opinions that don't fit the narrative like r/The_Donald have been getting purged. That sub is gone once Trump is out of office, and if he gets elected for another term Reddit has a real dilemma. The anime community also just got hit not too long ago, and r/manga is in a legal grey area.

And I'm sure once those are gone the journos will find something else to complain about. I will never understand why Reddit panders to people who don't know the first thing about the site. If advertisers want to pull out then so be it. At some point you've gotta draw a line in the sand.

They don't even give a definition of CR for them. What was it? Warner Bros can probably claim rights on a quarter of the multimedia. Feels a bit more like they pushing this sub to close. Why wait 74 strikes? It's weird.

Edit: I wrote CP instead of CR

If I had to guess, I think the problem is linking to or mentioning names of sites that provide illegal torrent links or illegal streaming.

And I think the notices came to reddit because warner bros has an intern searching for links to those sites. He sits all day long googling stuff like

"how to download Transformers"

"best torrent program"

"what stream should I use instead of _____"

"list of torrent sites" and of course the names of all the top100 illegal torrent/streaming sites.

Those google results contain reddit posts, and presto.

[-] mistralol  22 points 3 days ago

Yes that is part of the problem. Its more complex though what the company's do is have somebody write a program that does the searching automatically for links and automatically monitor the content and they treat links on a site as bad as the content its self but regardless of the actual content or the law.

A great example of a failure of these system was sony. When they did a copyright take down against an orchestra for playing bach and then uploading it to youtube. The trick here was that the music was written prior to copyright laws :) so anyone is permitted to play it without restriction. Only sony had at one stage also played it and had their own copy printed on a cd which they own the rights to. But then attempted to claim those rights against somebody else who did the same.

NASA. Yes NASA also had a takedown notice from its mars rover video. Kinda hard to infringe somebody elses copyright here when doing something that has NEVER been done before and this isn't the first and last time this has happened to NASA. More Info: <https://www.theverge.com/2012/8/6/3223820/nasa-rover-youtube-copyright-takedown> When somebody like NASA has to fight to keep a video of their control room online. Somebody somewhere has overstepped the mark. Whats the small guy meant to do?

But yeah basically creating a link in a page "Film Name" to a torrent "Film Name.torrent" with a torrent with files names "Film Name.mp4" will probably get flagged for copyright take down. Regardless of what the mp4 actually contains (fill it with zero's for example) because they don't bother to actually confirm the data.

That's a distinction that's just simply never mattered to the people in charge, on both ends... The rights holders and the web/forum/whatever protocol admins.

Besides P2P services that never hosted the content themselves, one of the earliest publicized instances was the old Suprnova website, which was just an aggregator of torrent links. I don't even think the torrent files were hosted on their servers, but even if they were, the torrent file isn't the copyrighted material itself. Didn't really matter, though.

Later, another big one was that Operation In Our Sites, which took down a lot of link websites (and hosters, like Megavideo). One problem with that was that they were able to show that some of the website admins were uploading to third-party hosters themselves, so then it becomes facilitation, or something.

The monetization of piracy has really hurt it, IMO. It's inspired people to take more risks, like in the latter case with sites like Ninjavideo, uploading themselves so they can take advantage of hosting affiliate schemes. And of course today we have everything from that, to subscription-based apps and services, to the heavy use of advertising on websites, all the way to hard-coding ads directly into video files.

Shit was a lot easier for people to get away with when there wasn't money involved, because it didn't break as many laws and didn't give law enforcement and the courts as many reasons to go after them. It's not the only factor, but it's a substantial factor.

Reddit Admins issuing a vague warning while refusing to give specifics is a hallmark of an impending subreddit ban and is likely only given to mark off a checkbox in their beauracratic subreddit ban process that requires documentation of the appearance of attempts at remediation. It likely doesn't matter what the moderation team does at this point - a ban is imminent.

It's time to back-up what is important and designate a back-up destination for the community to migrate to when it occurs.

That's my take on it as well, ArcFault. Went through this last year with another legal yet banned sub, and your thought that they're just ticking the boxes matches exactly what we went through back then.

Which means that your second point, archive and migration, are priority now. There should be no expectation that further warning will be given before admin strikes the sub as well as the personal accounts of mods and other key people.

This is our formal warning about repeat infringement in this community. Over the past months we've had to remove material from the community in response to copyright notices 74 times. That's an unusually high number taking into account the community's size.

Google Translator says:

We have to do our jobs. We don't like having to do our jobs when we can just have volunteers do it for free. Unfortunately, the cons of sometimes having to do our jobs is beginning to outweigh the benefit we get from sitting back and having 351,000 users' worth of traffic on our subreddit. Let this notice serve as a Cover Our Ass note in case a copyright holder attempts to sue us for the content on our website, which we own and you don't, but you better clean it up, even though it's not illegal, or we'll destroy the community you built.

Sincerely,

Fuck you.

(P.S. You can still call for politicians to be murdered here every hour of every day, as long as we agree with your politics.)

74 DMCA complaints for a community over 350K is an unusual amount? About a topic such as piracy? Yup, this subreddit is getting banned.

Solutions suggested: Make the rules harder. "Recruit" (employee without pay) more mods. Remove content we won't tell you about. Get banned.

I wonder what percentage of those DMCA complaints are incorrect, or why if the mods here are being held responsible, they aren't notified.

Well, hopefully we get a decent reddit replacement one day. I feel like plenty of people are ready to jump ship.

Reddit isn't the community we once frequented every day, it's changed, for the worse. Us users are playing the waiting game for another Reddit alternative to come out and migrate to it as we did from Digg.

If we migrated from Digg to Reddit, we can migrate from Reddit to somewhere else.

I absolutely hate reddit. They're going crazy banning subreddits and censoring like there's no tomorrow. Wish there was a better alternative.

Pro tip: Save the mega thread as a pdf.

Reddit is dying.

They want to go pubic, but that will ruin them.

It's a wonder this community had survived so long.

All that has to happen is for this sub to make the news. Reddit will shut it down instantly.

Is there a backup place to discuss?
